

Avoid a Pitfall that Ruins Relationships

If you are thinking about testing someone's love then you should read this article carefully before risking serious damage to your relationship. Testing someone's love can be a trap that ruins your relationship with them.

Learn why testing love ruins relationships so that you may avoid this relationship pitfall and heal the damage that testing someone's love can cause.

Healers and psychics may want to add this valuable lesson to their toolkits.

About Love, Testing Love

By Greg Gourdian, aka Grigori Rho Gharvey, etc, et al...

We wanted to share one of the most common healings we have done with psychic readings with anyone who needs to heal a love relationship.

Perhaps you have already read our poem Emergency Broadcast which closes with the lines:

*You have love, you are love, and you can only love...
dear love, do not test it.*

These words were an echo of advice we found ourselves providing to our psychic reading clients on a frequent basis.

Putting it bluntly, it is never good to test another person's love.

If we meet a client who seems to need advice on this subject we might introduce this issue to them by remarking that we see that they have faced some trials in their love life and that they have often doubted whether they are loved.

The typical response is "yes".

We would continue by speculating that in order to know whether they are truly loved in their relationship that they have sometimes tried to test their partner's love.

Again, a typical reply is "yes".

We go on to say that it often seems necessary to test their partner's love more frequently because no matter how well they may try to test their partner's love, they always wind up deeper in doubt. They may often wind up convincing themselves that their partner does not love them as much as they believe love their partner.

All too often the reply to this remark is also "yes".

If our client contradicts us at this point we examine the truthfulness of their assertion carefully. Usually they are correct and they have already learned the harm that results from testing their partner's love.

We suggest that they have learned this lesson and wait to make sure that they can describe this lesson in their own words. If they hesitate too long or fail to show they understand this lesson then we proceed with our explanation of this lesson as if they had responded "yes" to make sure that they learn this valuable lesson which is too often needed by people who feel they need to test their partner's love.

This lesson applies to all relationships with family and friends, as well as lovers.

We explain the lesson about testing someone's love something like this:

When we test a person's love we may do many kinds of harm, harm to our self, harm to our partner, and harm to our relationship with our partner. We may also harm our children, our family, or our friends, by testing their love, particularly if our tests have disappointing results.

The harm we do to our lovers, family, or friends is that any test of love is a form of manipulation; nearly all people resent being manipulated, and our partners in love are no exception.

If someone we love recognizes they are being tested they may feel pain, resentment, and possibly anger.

If someone we love feels hurt, resentful, or angry they may be inclined to deliberately fail our test to show us that they do not like to be manipulated.

We may then lose faith in our relationship because the person we love chooses to fail our test of their love, even though they may still love us very much.

If someone we love chooses to pass our test by doing whatever we have tried to manipulate them into doing, then their pain, resentment, and anger may fester and grow; this usually does a lot of damage in their relationship with us.

The special people we love cannot feel good about giving in to the demands of our tests because we tried to manipulate them rather than allowing them to demonstrate their love to us in their own way with their own inspiration and initiative.

If someone we love does not know they are being tested they may acquiesce and give us what we want without any bad feeling, but this seemingly positive result can still backfire.

If someone we love fails to understand what we want, or if they do not understand that we wanted something then they may seem to fail our test. In this case we may choose to feel hurt or unloved even though they might have passed our test had they recognized what we wanted.

If our loved one recognized we wanted something and complied with our wishes, then we cannot feel genuinely happy because we know we manipulated them.

We know that whatever our loved one gave us or did for us doesn't really count because their response didn't come from their spontaneous natural love.

Instead, we know that we tricked them into doing something we probably cannot appreciate because we wind up feeling guilty about how we manipulated them.

This is the serious damage we do to ourselves and our relationships by testing the love of anyone we love; aside from losing the spontaneity of our partner's love, we inspire more guilt within ourselves.

It doesn't matter if we deserve whatever we manipulated someone we love into doing for us; we are still guilty of manipulating.

A person usually knows in their heart that being manipulated is wrong; consequently they may know by extension that manipulating someone else is wrong. They may know that if they are true with themselves in their heart that they will always inspire pain, regret, guilt and insecurity for what they do when they act manipulatively.

If we examine all the possible results of testing a partner's love then we may see that nearly anything that happens as a result of testing a partner's love has a negative consequence both for ourselves and the person we love, thereby damaging our relationship with our loved one as well as hurting them and hurting our self.

Consequently, our anxiety and insecurity regarding our relationship with our loved one is increased by testing them. When we test someone's love we wind up feeling more insecure in our relationship which is ironic because it was our insecurity with our relationship that inspired us to test the love of someone we love in the first place.

As our insecurity gets worse our need to test our loved one's love increases and we may test them more often, or our tests may become more demanding, more difficult for our loved one to cope with or fulfill. We make them feel inadequate which makes them feel more anxious and insecure with us.

If you keep testing the love of someone you love it becomes more difficult for them to pass your tests; they wind up feeling more insecure as a result and so do you.

This often becomes a very vicious cycle with no way out until we choose to stop testing our loved one's love and give our loved one time to set aside the defense mechanisms they have built up against us as a result of our testing their love.

The defenses our loved ones necessarily develop within themselves as a result of our testing their love get in the way of the mutual trust and love in our relationship.

Once our loved ones no longer feel they are being manipulated they may be more free to expressive their love for us in their own ways with their own inspiration and spontaneity.

It may take time for our loved one to resume loving us in their own unique, personal way; be patient with them, often recovery may only happen very slowly.

We may not like all the gifts our partner selects for us or all the things they may try to do for us, but at least now they are trying to please us on their own initiative, inspired by their love for us. That is a far greater reward than any tokens of love we can manipulate from the person we love.

This cycle of testing became apparent early on in our psychic reading career; at first we were a bit surprised just how wide-spread this problem is.

We understood, on reflection, that aside from greed, the mechanism driving most people to test another person's love is nearly always insecurity; nearly all people have self doubts; regardless of denial, all people are prone to feel insecure at times.

It is important to learn to respond to self doubt or insecurity with personal affirmations rather than trying to manipulate someone we love to provide the positive reinforcement we hope for.

The more your own individual self worth shines through to you, the more others will naturally appreciate you for who you are and what you are; then you will know the comfort of the love and kindness of your family or partner on a daily basis, underscoring your success in learning to love yourself well and in learning to accept and love your partner with unconditional love.

We have this further advice if someone you love is testing your love:

If a loved one often tests your love for them in ways that often make you feel manipulated, inadequate, or out of sorts with them then try taking the initiative.

Your partner is most likely feeling insecure; they can only make themselves feel more insecure by testing you. Even if you do everything they want they may still become more insecure.

By taking the initiative to demonstrate your love for them in your own way you may begin to ease their anxiety and replace their insecurity with better feelings of contentment and joy.

Many of our clients understood this lesson once we had made this explanation. We could often see an immediate change in them; we could see their resolution to change their behavior, to stop testing in order to give their relationship and loved one time to heal.

We hope that this lesson will serve you well in all of your relationships with those you love.

If you are a healer or psychic reader then we hope you will choose to add this lesson to your healing toolkit so that this message grows within you and around you until it comes back to you full circle and everyone you love has learned to love themselves and all other people wholeheartedly and unconditionally.

Enjoy!

BIO:

We have been collectively known by the name Greg Gourdian for the purposes of publishing our articles. We perceive ourselves as a collective of people spanning many worlds in different universes. We seem to share many bodies; however we have only one body here in this world we share with you now.

We worked with the general public as a psychic reader for a little over four years from 1981 to 1986.

Much of our written work has been channeled however we often have no idea whose voices are speaking through us when we channel.

We have many strange tales to tell regarding our adventures in this world and our spiritual journeys.

We try to tell our tales in a humorous, engaging, or entertaining manner.

While we were a high-school student we channeled or taught classes in metaphysics & parapsychology, sociology, and psychology.

We are still emerging from the closet in regard to being a collective of many people inhabiting what appears to be a single body in the context of the world we appear to share with you. Our current written works reflect this new change in perspective as we have adopted plural forms of reference to ourselves that may not always appear consistently, particularly in our older work. Using plural forms of self-reference helps us to develop a greater awareness of ourselves as a collective as well as conveying to other people how we perceive ourselves.

We hope you will understand if we sometimes may sound awkward or conceited as a consequence of making this adjustment in how we refer to ourselves.

Our group's primary beliefs share these ideals:

- Love should always be universal.
- Liberty should be unconditional for everyone.
- Justice is best served by not judging yourself or any other people.
